The Friend compliments me on the fact that I have imputed no evil motives to those whom I criticize, and I in turn cannot too highly acknowledge the manly courtesy with which the editor has borne his share in what has been to both of us a painful controversy. I know of nothing more contemptible in controversy than the imputation of motives to your opponent; but I have had to bear that, as I knew I should. The paltry motives of national jealousy, personal ambition, "royalist" glamor—have all been flung at me, and I do not tremble. But one thing I ask, that the friends, who have been the friends of a lifetime, who have been the friends of an unspeakable grief to me, that my sense of honor and duty compelled me to take up a position which must have given pain to them as well as to myself. Every conviction tells me that a government of law and order cannot rest upon the basis of the acclamations of a mass meeting. The edifice may grow and look fair, and the builders may be honest and true—but if the foundation is rotten, the building can never be safe. I ventured to warn some of my friends last year of the mess into which they were getting, and I will close this letter with a quotation from another letter which you published for me dated Nov. 24, 1892. Perhaps some of those who rebuked me for my utterances then, may not be unwilling now to reconsider, in the light of their present political condition, the warning I had the temerity to give. I said "a suspicion of disloyalty and infidelity has gathered around some of those who ought to be directing Hawaiian affairs, and they have not only lost their own influence, but have played into the hands of worse men, who have at least wit enough to be loyal." When the lesson contained in those words has been honestly accepted, I can see some prospect of peace for Hawaii.

I only ask that my friends will not be the less my friends because I have the courage to say an unpopular thing, when I know it to be true.
